Customs and Traditions

Compatriots & Defenders, This quarter I write to you about our customs and traditions. Each State Society have unique ways in which they preserve and celebrate the history of the War of 1812. These traditions are wonderful ways with which they teach the public about the deeds of our ancestors. I invite the Presidents of the several State Societies to write a few lines about their special practices and submit them for publication in future editions of the "War Cry".

As an example, the Society of the War of 1812 in the State of Indiana regularly sets up a recruiting tent at major War of 1812 reenactments within their state. Their members, wives and children have researched and created detailed period appropriate clothing which they wear at these events. The Indiana Society also serves on the Board of Directors for the major events within their state – assuring historical accuracy and authenticity in the presentations. Hopefully the 2026 Triennial meeting will provide all Companions & Defenders an opportunity to enjoy Indiana's traditions.

Our 2024 Board of Directors' meeting will provide another opportunity to observe the customs and traditions of a State Society. We will meet in Baltimore, Maryland on Saturday September 14, 2024. While in Baltimore we will link up with the Maryland Society for their annual Defenders' Day events in and around Fort McHenry. There is more information about these events in this edition.

With the best of regards – Rob Pollock, PG

Symptoms of Heat Exhaustion vs. Heatstroke

Some symptoms of heat exhaustion and heatstroke are similar, but these conditions are also very different. It is important to know that while heat exhaustion isn't as severe as heatstroke, it shouldn't be taken lightly because it can easily progress to heatstroke.

Heat Exhaustion Symptoms

Heat exhaustion occurs after a person has been exposed to high temperatures and is experiencing dehydration. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the most common signs of heat exhaustion are: Heavy sweating, cold, pale, and clammy skin, a fast or weak pulse, nausea and/or vomiting, muscle cramps, weakness or fatigue, dizziness, headache, fainting or near fainting.

Heatstroke Symptoms

Heatstroke is the most serious form of heat illness and is considered a medical emergency. It often occurs after milder heat illnesses, including heat cramps, fainting, and heat exhaustion. It can also occur in people who have no previous signs of heat illness.

Heatstroke results when there is prolonged exposure to high temperatures in combination with dehydration. This leads to a failure in the body's internal temperature control. Heatstroke occurs when the body's temperature reaches 104 degrees.

Having that high core body temperature affects the central nervous system, causing the following symptoms:

Nausea, vomiting, seizures, confusion and disorientation, loss of consciousness or coma

Additional symptoms of heatstroke include:

Dry skin that doesn't sweat or profuse sweating, dizziness, low urine output, rapid breathing or fast heart rate and weakness.

Causes of Heat Exhaustion and Heatstroke

The causes of heat exhaustion and heatstroke are similar. The leading cause of both conditions is the body's inability to cool itself due to hot weather, exercise, or both.

When to See a Healthcare Provider

If you think you might be experiencing heat exhaustion, you should stop what you are doing and rest. Move indoors or to a shady area and drink cool water or a sports drink.

Seek medical attention for signs of heat exhaustion that do not improve within an hour of starting fluids and resting. Get immediate help if you, or someone else:

Cannot keep fluids down, developing a fever of 103 degrees or higher, having trouble speaking standing, or walking, excessive sweating, and if you become confused or lose consciousness.

Battle of New Orleans – 209th Anniversary Commemoration

William Allerton III, Vice President General Media Relations

The 209th commemoration of the Battle of New Orleans began on January 6th with a reenactment of the Battle organized by Friends of the Battle of New Orleans on grounds near the Chalmette Battlefield. Reenactors from all over the United States and Canada brought their artillery, flags, tents, uniforms, and accoutrements to make the history of the War of 1812 come alive. Limited artillery demonstrations and camp reenactments were also held at the Chalmette Battlefield.

On January 6, 2024, the Louisiana Society held its traditional Grand Military Victory Ball at the Metairie Country Club. The costume de rigueur consisted of uniforms from the War of 1812, white ties and tails, and ballgowns for the ladies. The annual event reenacts the Grand Military Victory Ball held by the City of New Orleans to celebrate Jackson's stunning victory at Chalmette. The belles of New Orleans society were presented at the ball to Major General Andrew Jackson and his wife Rachel, Governor William C.C. Claiborne, and Mayor Nicolas Girod.

The dignitaries at this year's ball were Society President Brig. General Rodney B. Painting portraying Major General Andrew Jackson; Gregory D. Woolverton portraying Governor William C.C. Claiborne; and Ball General Chairman Roger F. Villere, Jr. portraying Mayor Nicholas Girod. Society members presented les Demoiselles to the dignitaries as in 1815. Les Demoiselles included Dove Elizabeth Leblanc (representing New Orleans), Jenna May Leinecke (representing Louisiana), Lia Hope Leinecke (representing Massachusetts), Kanga Jane LeBlanc (representing North Carolina), Mackenzie Ruth Riggs (representing Rhode Island); and Alexandra Margaret Gray (representing Georgia). After the presentation, Les Demoiselles and their escorts danced to the music of the Jimmy Maxwell orchestra, joined later by members and guests. As the 2024 Grand Military Victory Ball approached the wee hours of the morning, the gathering enjoyed a New Orleans-style breakfast, including fresh fruit and cheeses, bacon, sausage, eggs, biscuits, grillades and grits, and bread pudding for dessert.

Former Society President Brig. General John B. Dunlap III (ret.) served as Grand Marshal. He was assisted by Vice Marshal LTC Jacques D. Walker (Ret.). Lieutenants included Rushton G. Barrosse, Henry P. Rouquette, Jr. Gerard Schroeder, and Shannon R. Walgamotte. Committeemen included Ron Drez, Major Bradley T. Hayes, Paul M. Melancon, D.D.S., and James T. Schneider.

Guests of Honor included Dianne Brown Cannestra, President National, U.S. Daughters of 1812; Mary Raye Casper, Honorary President National, U.S. Daughters of 1812; Patricia Gallagher, 4th Vice President National, U.S. Daughters of 1812, and Thomas E. Jacks, Past President General, General Society of the War of 1812.

In keeping with tradition, the 8th of January wreath-laying events took place in Jackson Square at the statue of Major General Andrew Jackson and the Chalmette Battlefield at the Chalmette Monument. Due to inclement weather, the Louisiana Society and Chalmette Chapter of the USD1812 led an abbreviated wreath-laying ceremony at Jackson Square. Patricia Gallagher, 4th Vice President National of USD1812, served as Master of Ceremonies. Brig. General Rodney B. Painting laid a wreath honoring the memory of Major General Andrew Jackson at the iconic equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson on behalf of the Louisiana Society. President National Dianne Brown Cannestra laid a wreath for the U.S. Daughters of 1812. St. Bernard Parish President Guy McInnes-- where the Chalmette Battlefield is located -- offered greetings, and Councilman Eugene Green represented the New Orleans City Council.

Following the Jackson Square ceremony, the United States Park Service conducted a wreath-laying ceremony at the Chalmette Monument on the grounds of the Chalmette Battlefield. Acting Chief Park Ranger Rachel Davidson represented the U.S. Park Service Jean Lafitte National Historical Park and Preserve at New Orleans; President National Dianne Brown Cannestra and Honorary President National Mary Raye Casper represented the U.S. Daughters of 1812; Brig. General Rodney B. Painting represented the Louisiana Society of the War of 1812, and Vice President General (Media) William Allerton III represented the General Society of the War of 1812. Photos of the events continue on the next three pages.

Several months ago, I received an email from John Florack who found an old postcard in family mementors and asked if we could figure out who the invitee was. Turns out it was an invitation to attend a Pennsylvania Society meeting on Feb 12, 1897 addressed to Congressman Henry Colvin Brewster (Society Member #528), who represented NY in the 54th and 55th Congress.

1813: Frenchtown, Lake Erie and Other Key Battles

Clay Hoffman (Indiana Society)

In early 1813, there was little doubt that the opening months of the War of 1812 had not gone well for the United States. Detroit had been surrendered and American forces had been routed at Queenston Heights on the Niagara River, the first major battle of the war. Raids by British-allied Native Americans in Illinois and Indiana had resulted in the deaths of many white settlers. At sea, however, the situation had been better as American ships had won several battles against British warships, despite the British having imposed a semi-tight blockade along the Atlantic seaboard.

Throughout much of 1813, American fortunes fared little better. As part of a plan to advance north and retake Detroit, the U.S. forced the retreat of the British and their indigenous allies on January 18th from Frenchtown, located along the frozen River Raisin in the Michigan territory. Despite the American success, the enemy rallied and launched a counterattack four days later on January 22nd, causing the loss of 397 U.S. soldiers, while 547 were taken prisoner. It was the second major loss of a U.S. force in the Michigan territory in five months, with Native American Warriors returning to Frenchtown the following day and massacring many of the wounded American soldiers who could not walk. Because of the bravery displayed, "Remember the River Raisin" became an American rallying cry.

On April 27, 1813, American forces supported by a naval flotilla defeated the British at the Battle of York (present-day Toronto, Ontario). After the provincial capital of Upper Canada was attacked, surviving British regulars withdrew to Kingston, abandoning the militia and civilians. The U.S. captured the fort, government buildings, and dockyard, while suffering casualties, before withdrawing two weeks later. While it was a clear victory, the Battle of York did not have decisive strategic results as Kingston was more important militarily.

The U.S. won a victory on May 25-27, 1813, at the Battle of Fort George, which was the westernmost of the British fortified posts on Lake Ontario. Troops of the U.S. Army and vessels of the U.S. Navy partnered in a successful amphibious assault, with commanders Winfield Scott and Oliver Hazard Perry emerging as admired leaders. While the Americans had inflicted heavy casualties and captured a strongly fortified position with fewer losses to themselves, the Battle of Fort George resulted in only a temporary foothold.

On October 26, 1813, a combined British and Canadian force, consisting of over 1,500 soldiers and Mohawk Warriors from Lower Canada defeated about 2,600 American regulars at the Battle of the Chateaugay (present-day Quebec). This defeat combined with the American loss at the Battle of Chrysler's Farm (present-day Morrisburg, Ontario) two weeks later ended any U.S. threat of advancing to Montreal.

The most significant American victories of 1813 took place in the Autumn. On September 10th, the Battle of Lake Erie was fought off the shore of Ohio. Led by commander Oliver Hazard Perry, nine vessels of the U.S. Navy defeated and captured six vessels of the British Royal Navy in what was one of the largest naval battles of the War of 1812. A major turning point, it ensured U.S. control of Lake Erie for the remainder of the war, and facing American supremacy, the British withdrew from Fort Detroit.

On October 5th, U.S. forces under the command of William Henry Harrison defeated the British along with a confederation of indigenous peoples known as Tecumseh's Confederacy at the Battle of the Thames in Upper Canada. The battle resulted in the death of Shawnee Chief Tecumseh and the demise of his confederacy.

Throughout 1813, the Americans continued to combat the Royal Navy effectively on the Atlantic, sinking a critical number of British warships.

As the year neared its end, a war between opposing Native American factions developed in the Southeastern United States. Fought largely in modern-day Alabama and along the Gulf Coast, the aggressors were the British-allied Red Sticks, a Muscogee tribal faction who opposed U.S. colonial expansion. With the American military already spread thin with the fighting of the War of 1812, the U.S. was forced to enter the Indian War as allies of several traditional enemies of the Muscogee, including the Choctaw and Cherokee Nations.

The Men of the Lake Erie Squadron: Facts vs. Myths

Eric E. Johnson, Great Lakes District Deputy President General

The manning of the Lake Erie Squadron during the War of 1812 has always been questionable. Master Commandant Oliver Hazard Perry repeatedly requested officers and men from his superior, Commodore Isaac Chauncey, from the Sackets Harbor Naval Station on Lake Ontario, New York. When Chauncey ignored Perry's letters, the master commandant went over the head of Chauncey, and requested men directly from the Secretary of the Navy.

Perry met with Chauncey in May 1813 to discuss the organization of the naval squadron on Lake Erie. In a letter to the Secretary of the Navy William Jones, Chauncey stated that he and Perry agreed that 740 officers and men would be needed to man the squadron.^[1] Chauncey then told Jones, "If Captain Perry can beat the enemy with half that number, no one will feel more happy than myself."

Chauncey always maintained that he needed the men to man his Lake Ontario Squadron, but he refused to engage the British in any decisive naval action on Lake Ontario during the war. Whenever he did engage the enemy, Chauncey withdrew from the action because he felt that he didn't have the advantage of winning. He also was hording men to man the new ships that were being built at Sackets Harbor.

The muster rolls of the naval vessels on Lake Ontario reveals that Chauncey had more men than what he needed to man his ships. His flagship, the U.S. Corvette Madison, had an authorized complement (manning) of 200 officers and men, but the muster roll for 1813 reveals that he had 353 men assigned, or 56% more than what was authorized by the U.S. Navy.^[2]

The Madison had 244 naval officers and men, seventy-two marines and thirty-seven supernumeraries listed on separate muster rolls for the second half of 1813. Supernumeraries were extra men assigned to a ship. The muster roll for the U.S. Frigate John Adams, which was serving on the Atlantic Ocean, a ship slightly larger than the Madison, and with only four additional cannons, had a complement of 220 officers and men. The muster roll for the John Adams for the period April 1813 to March 1815 shows that the ship had 380 naval officers and men, twenty-five marines and ten supernumeraries.^[3] The Madison had three-times the number of marines and almost four-times the number of supernumeraries compared to the ocean-going frigate.

The warships on the Atlantic Ocean always had more men than what was needed on each vessel simply because men were needed to serve as a prize crew for captured enemy ships in order to bring these ships back to an American port. On Lake Ontario, it only would have taken a day or two to bring back a prize to Sackets Harbor, while on the ocean, it could take weeks if not months to bring home a prize. The warships on the ocean operated for months at a time while vessels on Lake Ontario only operated for a couple of days before returning to port.

Commodore Chauncey had the men to supply the crews for both the Lake Erie Squadron and the Lake Champlain Squadron. He would only send a minimal number of men to both squadrons, and he let both Master Commandants Perry and Thomas MacDonough (commanding the Lake Champlain Squadron) to find the other men that they needed for their squadrons.

"Don't Give Up the Ship"

Perry paraphrased the words of Captain James Lawrence when his ship, the U.S. Frigate Chesapeake, was about to be captured on 1 June 1813 by the H.M. Frigate Shannon. Lawrence, being mortally wounded, was reported to have said "tell the men to fire faster and not to give up the ship; fight her till she sinks!" Too many words to be placed on a flag. Captain Lawrence died three days later.

How many men served under Perry?

There has always been a question of how many men served with Perry during the Battle of Lake Erie. This figure runs between 490 to over 600 men. Two of the most damaging sets of figures comes from two authors those figures have been constantly used in a number of books and articles over the years without any proof or justification. Many authors of historic books will site their sources from other books and not from actual documents. This presents a big problem in establishing the actual number of men who served with Perry!

Benson Lossing's Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812 is probably the most quoted work concerning the War of 1812.

^[4] Although an excellent history of the War of 1812, most of Lossing's facts and figures were not documented. He borrowed a lot of material from other previous published books, plus he interviewed a large number of veterans after this war. This book was first published in 1868, so only the youngest men serving during this war were still living when he researched his book.

In his chapter on the Battle of Lake Erie, he quotes, "The American commander had upon his muster-roll four hundred and ninety names. Of these the bearers of one hundred and sixteen were sick, and most of them too weak to go upon deck. About one fourth of Perry's crew were from Rhode Island; one fourth were regular seamen, American and foreign; about one fourth were raw volunteers, chiefly from Kentucky; and about another fourth were negroes." Lossing does not give the sources for these figures.

What muster rolls did Lossing use in his statement? The National Archives has the surviving muster rolls for the U.S. Navy in Record Group 45, and the surviving muster rolls for the U.S. Marine Corps in Record Group 127. The 490 figure is very close to the actual number of naval and marine service men who participated in the battle, but it doesn't include the U.S. Army soldiers and the militia men who also served in the squadron.

One fourth of his men were not from Rhode Island. Most of these men had been re-assigned to the Lake Ontario Station by Commodore Chauncey. Perry arrived at Sacket Harbor with 187 men and Chauncey commandeered 103 of these men. Approximately eighty-four men came with Perry to Lake Erie from Rhode Island. Many of these men were born on the east coast, and only a few from Rhode Island. All of these men had been stationed in Rhode Island.

One fourth of the men were chiefly from Kentucky. Robert B. McAfee's History of the Late War in the Western Country,^[5] which was first published in 1816 states, "General Harrison accompanied by several officers, went down to the fleet, taking with him a company, commanded by Captain Stockton, of the 28th regiment of 12 months' regulars under Colonel Owings of Kentucky, including all the seaman that could be found in the army; and also, about 20 volunteers under Lieutenant Coburn from Payne's company of Johnson's regiment."

Captain George Stockton's company from the 28th Regiment of U.S. Infantry did not participate in the Battle of Lake Erie on 10 September 1813. Stockton commanded a detachment of U.S. Army soldiers from the 2nd Brigade of the Army of the Northwest, made up of men from the 26th, 27th, and 28th Regiments of U.S. Infantry. Once he delivered his men to the naval squadron, his duty was over, and then he and his detachment were assigned to the various ships in the naval squadron. These three regiments were stationed at Forts Stephenson, Seneca, and Ball in north central Ohio. These regiments were made up of 12-month soldiers.

Second Lieutenant John Henderson of the 2nd Regiment of U.S. Artillery commanded the detachment of volunteers from the 1st Brigade of the Army of the Northwest, stationed at Fort Meigs in northwestern Ohio. These men were from the 17th, 19th, and 24th Regiments of U.S. Infantry plus one company from the 2nd U.S. Artillery. These regiments were made up of men who had enlisted for 18-months, during the war, or for five years.

Also, there were soldiers from the 1st Brigade serving at Forts Stephenson, Seneca, and probably Ball. The 26th, 27th, and 28th Infantries were newly formed, and these soldiers from Fort Meigs were acting as the training cadre for these new regiments.

Finally, First Lieutenant John W. Coburn commanded a detachment from Captain John Payne's Light Dragoons Company of the Kentucky Militia. This Kentucky company, which was serving a three-month tour of duty with the Army of the Northwest, organized a detachment of twenty-five volunteers for the naval squadron. Three detachments of soldiers, under three different officers-in-charge, marched their men from their forts to Camp Portage (present day Port Clinton, Ohio) where they were given their duty assignments with the squadron.

It is to be noted that the 17th and 28th Infantries were raised in Kentucky, while the 19th, 26th and 27th Infantries were raised in Ohio, and the 24th Infantry was raised in Tennessee. The artillery company also was raised in Ohio.

Anderson Quisenberry in his book, Kentucky in the War of 1812, lists all of the men in Captain Stockton's detachment as men from his company.^[6] He assumed that all of these men in Stockton's detachment were Kentuckians.

John M. Trowbridge, in his article entitled To Meet the Enemy on Any Element: The Kentucky Militia in the Battle of Lake Erie, makes a great attempt to properly identify the men in Captain Stockton's detachment.^[7] Trowbridge recognized the fact that this detachment was a composite 'company' made up of men from different regiments and that they were not all Kentuckians. Actually, Pennsylvania had more men serving in the squadron compared to the number of men from Kentucky.

Trowbridge makes the same mistake as Quisenberry, that is, he combines the three detachments into a single company under the command of Stockton, who was the senior officer. All three men, Stockton, Henderson, and Coburn, would have organized their men into a military formation, marched them down to Camp Portage, and reported to the senior naval officer for duty on the squadron. There would have been no need to combine these three army detachments before reporting to the U.S. Navy.

Lossing's final two statements need to be combined, that is, a quarter of the men were regular seaman and a quarter of the men were Negroes. Approximately two-thirds of the squadron were regular seamen and marines. The navy did not keep records as to the color of a man's skin. Family histories, land bounty applications, and pension records, plus British prisoners of war records, have identified a number of these American Negroes who served in this squadron.

The statement that twenty-five percent of the squadron were Negroes will never be proven. All of the known Negroes serving with Perry were enlisted personnel in the U.S. Navy and in the U.S. Marine Corps. No Negroes have been identified as serving as soldiers with the Army of the Northwest, or with the Kentucky, the Pennsylvania, and the Ohio militias.

Reconstructing the muster rolls

The American State Papers contains the prize list of those men who served on the ships during the Battle of Lake Erie, plus the causality list of those who were killed or wounded during this engagement. These lists were presented to the United State Senate after the battle.

Purser Samuel Hambleton, from the U.S. Brig Lawrence, was given the task of identifying all of the men who fought with Perry. Acting Surgeon Usher Parsons, from the same ship, would have been tasked to identify all of the killed and wounded for the causality list. He was the chief surgeon during the battle.

Congress approved legislation on 18 April 1814 to award the men, or their heirs, who had captured the British naval squadron on Lake Erie the sum of $255,000.^[8] An addition $5,000 was given to Captain Oliver Hazard Perry from another fund. Perry was promoted from master commandant to captain on 10 September 1813. This was a retroactive promotion. It must be noted that Perry was never a commodore during the War of 1812. Commodore was a title, not a rank. A master commandant is equivalent to the rank of commander in today's U.S. Navy.

The prize list, as shown in the American State Papers, lists 533 men who received prize money.^[9] A total of 123 men were on the causality list, consisting of twenty-seven killed and ninety-six wounded.^[10] Twenty-two men, or their heirs, on the causality list were not awarded prize money. This brings the total of 555 men known to have fought on the ships during the Battle of Lake Erie from these two sources.

Hambleton's original prize list contained 596 names.^[11] This list has been lost since the battle but Hambleton gave this number to Perry in a letter dated 26 May 1814. The crew of the U.S. Schooner Ohio was not on the initial list but they were added later, thus brings the muster total to 608 men. This vessel did not participate in the battle. The Ohio had been assigned to retrieve provisions from Erie, Pennsylvania, and it arrived back at Put-in-Bay, Ohio the day after the battle.

Parsons verified the number on the finalized prize list in an article for the New England Journal of Medicine and Surgery in 1818.^[12] The surgeon stated that there were about 600 officers and men in the battle and that an additional thirty-one were unfit for duty on the Lawrence, about the same number on the Niagara (actually twenty-eight).

The names of fifty-three men are missing between Hambleton's initial prize list and the prize list as represented to the U.S. Congress. It is not known if the initial prize list listed all of the men in the squadron or only those who qualified for prize money. Men had been left behind at the Erie station due to sickness or they were guarding the naval stores. The sick men were also taken off the ships before the battle and placed in a temporary hospital at Put-in-Bay. There also were men who took care of the sick on the island. Plus, there were a small number of men who had died or who had deserted before the battle. The total number of men serving in the squadron, from all services, at the time of the battle could be as high as 700 men. Again, not all participated in the battle!

Surgeon Parsons listed the wounded from the battle as having a total of twenty-five compound fractures, four simple fractures, three grape-shot wounds, thirty-seven splinter and lacerated wounds, seven concussions, ten contusions, and six sprains. Three of the wounded later died from their injuries. The majority of the wounds were inflicted by the ship's pine structure as they were being torn apart by the British cannon balls.

The prize money was awarded nearly eight months after the battle. Hambleton would have constructed his prize list using the muster rolls of the nine ships which participated in the battle plus the muster roll from the U.S. Schooner Ohio. He would have also worked with each of the ship's commanders in order to fix any discrepancies on these muster rolls.

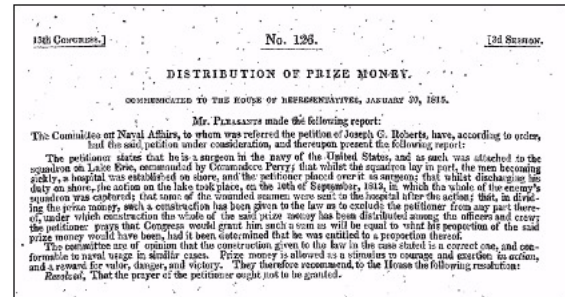

From April to July 1814, Hambleton would have sent a notice to the major newspapers announcing that the men who served during the battle needed to apply for their prize monies. He would have also notified the various ships and naval stations where some of the men were transferred after the battle, and to the commanders of the regiments where the army soldiers and militiamen came from who served on the ships.

It appears that the officers, sailors, and marines who were still in the service, and who were still assigned to the Lake Erie Station, received their prize monies in July 1814. On the final prize list of those who received prize monies, the final column shows the name of the person who received the award. Those still in the service are listed as 'To himself,' while the other names were the servicemen themselves, their lawyers, or their heirs.

All of the men who processed out of the naval service after the battle would have been given a discharge paper which denoted their service. The men who were wounded would have also been given a surgeon's certificate of disability denoting the wounds or injuries that the men received during the battle. Finally, the heirs would have been given a certificate of death denoting that their loved ones had died during the battle. The last two certificates were needed for the wounded men or the heirs when they applied for pensions.

The men (or heirs) who were discharged from the naval service, needed to hire a lawyer in order to apply for the prize money. The lawyer would have had to prepare the application and verify the service for each veteran. Of the $242,250 awarded as prize money, only $234,020.53 was claimed. $8,229.47 was left unclaimed.

Approximately fifth-three men did not claim any prize money. The reasons may be that they or their heirs did not hear about the prize money offer, if a man had died and left no heirs, he refused to apply for the prize money, or if he was a deserter. Deserters, by law, were not entitled to pensions and military land bounties, and it may have been the same for prize monies. However, there are a few deserters who did receive prize monies. These men deserted after the battle, and they appear to still be entitled to the monies.

Dr. Robert's petition to Congress

There were also men who were left behind at Erie in order to protect the naval stores at the station. The exact number of sailors and marines at this station during the battle is not known. The Lake Erie Station had a small naval hospital.

According to Dr. Parson's diary,^[13] four sick men were sent back to the station on the U.S. Schooner Ohio on 4 September 1813. There were probably other sick men at the hospital plus the staff to care for them.

At Put-in-Bay before the battle, the sick men were taken off the ships and a temporary hospital was established on shore. Surgeon Joseph G. Roberts was placed in charge, causing him to miss the battle. He treated many of the wounded after the battle when the wounded men were taken off the ships and transferred to the hospital. This would have been both the American and the British wounded.

Dr. Roberts petitioned Congress in order to receive part of the prize money. His request was denied on 30 January 1815.

^[14] The reason was that the "prize money is allowed as a stimulus to courage and exertion in action, and a reward for valor, danger, and victory." It seems a little unfair for Surgeon Roberts, and probably a few other men who would have worked at the hospital, was not given a part of the prize monies, while the crew of the Ohio was permitted to receive this award. Both groups were under the orders of Master Commandant Perry

The question still remains! How many men served during the Battle of Lake Erie? The muster rolls for the ships of the Lake Erie Station during and before the battle no longer exist. A couple of U.S. Marine Corps musters do exist prior to this battle, but this represents only a fraction of the men who fought on the lake.

The missing muster rolls

Master Commandant Perry, upon taking command of the Lake Erie Naval Station in March 1813, would have ordered his purser to prepare a muster roll for the station. This roll would have been constructed listing all of the men assigned to the station, first by rank, and then alphabetically. Thus, officers would be listed first, then warrant officers, mates, and finally enlisted men.

A.O. Denton
4th Auditor

Unlike U.S. Army and U.S. Marine Corps muster rolls, the U.S. Navy's rolls included whether the men received their rations (meals) per week. The army created a new muster roll per company every two months. The marines created a new muster roll per detachment (whether assigned to a ship or to a shore station) every month. In addition, the marines had their own pages on the naval muster roll to account for their rations. The navy's rolls lasted until the ration columns were filled, and then a new roll would have been constructed. A single naval muster roll could be in place for over a year until a new one was needed.

The left side of a naval muster roll was very similar to the army's and marines' rolls. The right side was columnized by month and by week in order to annotate that each man had received his rations per week. Each man also was given a unique muster roll number. With this number, the information on the men with the same name, such as, John Smith, could be tract, when there were multiple John Smith's assigned to the same ship or shore station.

As each detachment of men arrived at the station between March and September of 1813, the new men would have been added to the muster roll, starting at the end of the roll. Only when a new muster roll had to be created, after all of the ration columns had been filled, would a new roll be created, re-arranging all of the assigned men at the station by rank and name.

The muster roll for the Lake Erie Naval Station is missing between March and September 1813. A new muster roll was created in 1814, probably on the orders of Captain Arthur Sinclair, but the first half of this roll is missing.^[15] Sinclair was the new commanding officer of the squadron after Perry left after the battle. The roll starts with muster roll number 129. The first complete muster roll for the station is dated 10 April 1815, with Captain Sinclair having muster roll number 1.

I respectfully state that the name of John Beason does appear on the prize list of the squadron under Com. Perry. He was in the action of the 10 Sep 1813. No doubt, or he would not have been entitled to the sum received by him. The rolls of the Squadron were destroyed with the Tres'y Dep't in 1833.

I respectfully state that the name of John Beason does appear on the prize list of the squadron under Com. Perry. He was in the action of the 10 Sep 1813. No doubt, or he would not have been entitled to the sum received by him. The rolls of the squadron were destroyed with the Tres'y Dep't in 1833.

A document in John Beeson's pension application refers to the "rolls of the squadron."^[16] This document from the U.S. Treasury Department claims that the muster rolls were destroyed at this department in 1833. No reason is given as to how the muster rolls were destroyed or why they were destroyed. Beeson served as a landsman on the U.S. Schooner Ariel, and he was injured during the battle. His name is not on the causality list but it is on the prize list.

A clue as to what happened to the station's original muster roll can be found in Tristram Burges' Battle of Lake Erie with notices of Commodore Elliott's Conduct in that Engagement.^[17] In this book, Burges states that "The log-book disappeared soon after Perry left the fleet and the command of it was assumed by Elliott, and has not since been recovered." He is referring to the logbook of the U.S. Brig Niagara, which probably had incriminating evidence on Elliott's conduct during the battle.

If this was the case, then Elliott took all of the squadron's logbooks and the station's muster roll when he was transferred back to Sackets Harbor, in order to protect himself from any personal attacks on his conduct during the battle. It is to be noted that none of the logbooks of the squadron are located at the National Archives.^[18] Elliott probably destroyed the log books and muster rolls after he left the squadron. Elliott was the temporary commander of the squadron until Captain Sinclair arrived at the station.

Benson Lossing's figures

Benson Lossing's figure of 490 men manning the squadron is an extremely low figure. Subtracting the 116 sick men from 490 leaves 374 men, a figure that is too low even for the manning of the two brigs of the squadron, let alone the manning of all ten ships.

The statement that "The American commander had upon his muster-roll four hundred and ninety names" refers to the fact the Perry (the commander) had 490 naval and marines on his muster rolls. This figure is extremely close to the actual number of known sailors and marines in the squadron. Apparently, there is another set of muster rolls for this squadron that Lossing had access to, which was not the set of muster rolls that were destroyed in 1833 by the Treasury Department.

It is to be noted that when a muster occurs, whether in the army, navy, or marines, multiple copies of a muster rolls were created. A copy would have been sent to either the War Department or the Navy Department, a copy to the regimental or naval commander, and a copy for the company or ship. The copy for the Treasury Department (for payment purposes) was destroyed. Probably, not all of the other muster roll copies were destroyed, some may still exist.

Perry would not have had access to the muster rolls of the U.S. Army and the state militias to help construct the list of 490, so the claim that a quarter of his men were volunteers, mostly from Kentucky, would be false. This may be Lossing's assumption and not Perry's facts.

Purser Samuel Hambleton's figures

list is probably extremely accurate. Add to this figure the number of sick men who were taken off the ships before the battle, and the number of men who were sent back to Erie because of sickness, plus any sick men already in the hospital at Erie with the number of men needed to care for these men, and to protect the naval stores, you have close to 700 men serving in the Lake Erie Squadron at the time of the battle.

Another eighteen have been identified as serving with the squadron before the battle. This includes one man who was discharged and released to civil authorities, two who were discharged before the battle, six who had died at the station before the battle, and nine men who deserted at this station or from the ships before the squadron left Erie for Put-in-Bay.

Three muster rolls have survived for the U.S. Marine Corps' Lake Erie Detachment prior to the Battle of Lake Erie. The muster rolls are for April, June, and July of 1813. The first column on a muster roll shows the sequential ranking number of the enlisted men by rank and then enlistment date. The second column is for the name of the marine. The third column is the rank of the marine. The fourth column is the date of enlistment. The final column is for any remarks.

Remarks would include the dates of promotions or demotions, dates for deaths and injuries, desertions, any absentees, and any other comments that the officer-in-charge deemed appropriate. The navy would have had the same type of muster rolls. Each ship would have its own muster roll, while a naval station and a naval hospital would each have a separate muster roll for the men not assigned to ships.

Marine muster rolls were completed at the end of each month. A special set of muster rolls were probably completed before the ships left Erie, Pennsylvania. These rolls would have included the names, ranks, and units of all of the volunteers who signed on to the squadron.

The number of men on all of the muster rolls would probably have totaled 690 men. The remarks section would have indicated who was fit for duty and who was not fit for duty.

The Blacks and a Native American who served with the fleet

Determining the number of Blacks who served in the squadron can easily be done if we use the 'quarter of the men' theory, however, this figure is again too high. So far, this author has identified twenty-six Blacks who served in the Lake Erie Squadron between 1812 and 1825, of which, twenty-one served during the battle.

The U.S. Army had no restrictions of enlisting Blacks and Native Americans during the War of 1812. There were no known Blacks who served as soldiers in the Army of the Northwest. Officers from the 17th and 28th Regiments of Infantry, raised in Kentucky, and the 24th Regiment of Infantry, raised in Tennessee, did have Black waiters. Most of these waiters were probably personal servants and therefore, slaves. Kentucky and Tennessee were slave states during the War of 1812. Some of these Black waiters may have served on the ships as unpaid volunteers, and if so, they may not have been added to the muster rolls because they were still slaves.

The Army of the North, headquartered in the State of New York, did enlist Blacks as soldiers. [20] The 46th Regiment of U.S. Infantry (later renumbered as the 26th Regiment of U.S. Infantry) had 262 Blacks on its muster rolls. The Regiment of U.S. Light Artillery enlisted fifty-eight Blacks while the Corps of Artillery had thirteen Blacks on its musters, and the 10th Regiment of U.S. Infantry had ten Blacks. The 10th Infantry was raised in the Carolinas, so these men were probably free Blacks.

The U.S. Navy, as did the U.S. Marine Corps, permitted the enlisting of Blacks and Native Americans in this service under the Congressional Act of 3 March 1813. [21] However, Blacks and Native Americans normally served in the ranks of marine privates, boys, landsmen, seamen, ordinary seamen, musicians, and stewards. They would not have received officer's commissions or warrants, and it is doubtful that any Black or Native American would have served as a mate (petty officer).

There was a total of 239 men who served in the enlisted ranks of the navy in this squadron, so at the most, there would have been only sixty Blacks (one quarter of the men) serving in the squadron representing approximately 8% of the total number of men. Surgeon Parson, in his diary, listed Charles Pohig as a Narragansett Indian. He is the only known Native American to have served in the squadron during the battle.

Some sources claim that anywhere from ten to twenty-five percent of the seaman were Black on the ships of the U.S. Navy. Most naval and private ship records do not indicate race on their forms. The names of Black sailors do appear in family and county histories, in books on the War of 1812, and on some pension applications.

A new source of identifying Blacks who served in the naval forces of the United States lies in the American prisoner of war (POW) records housed in the National Archives of Great Britain. The POW ledgers for the British POW depots not only list the names of the prisoners, how they were captured and when they were sent to this prison, plus also their ages, nativity, and race. These British POW depots were located at Plymouth, Portsmouth, Chatham, Stapleton, and Dartmoor in England. The POW ledgers used in the British colonies, including Canada, did not record age, nativity, or race.

As an example: 867 American POWs at Dartmoor were listed as Negroes, Blacks, Colored, Men of Color, or Mulattos, which amounts to 13% of the total American POW population at this depot. Sixteen men are listed as Creoles, and there was one Chinese American. The last group of men to leave Dartmoor in 1815 were Blacks who were afraid of being released in a southern port and being placed into slavery. Most Blacks who were serving in the naval forces were free men.

A year after the Battle of Lake Erie, four ships from Perry's squadron were captured by the British. The schooners Ohio and Somers were captured on 12 August 1814 near Fort Erie, across the Niagara River from Buffalo, New York. The schooner Tigress was captured on 3 September 1814 while the schooner Scorpion was captured on 6 September 1814. Both of these ships were lost to naval actions on upper Lake Huron.

Eight men had been identified as being Black sailors from the Lake Erie Squadron while assigned to Dartmoor Prison. They are Moses Bailey, Charles Black, Henry Brown, William Griffin, Andrew Norton, Thomas Palmer, John Peters, and Jesse Williams.^[22] Brown and Williams had served on the U.S. Brig Lawrence during the Battle of Lake Erie while Palmer served on the U.S. Schooner Ariel and Andrew Norton on the U.S. Brig Niagara. Bailey, Black, Griffin and Peters joined the squadron after the battle.^[23]

When captured, Griffin, Norton, and Palmer were serving on the Tigress while Bailey, Brown, and Williams were on the Scorpion. Black and Peters were on the Somers. Bailey died at Dartmoor on 17 Feb 1815 from variola while the other men were released at the war's end.

All of the men from these ships were first sent to Montreal and then to Quebec before arriving at Halifax, Canada.^[24] Black, Griffin, and Peters arrived at Quebec from Montreal on 5 October 1814.^[25] The other five Black men arrived at Quebec on 1 November 1814. The H.M. Transport Freedom brought Black, Griffin, and Peters to Halifax on 1 November 1814 and the other five men on 7 November 1814.

At Halifax, the marines, and the army personnel who were serving as marines, were exchanged or paroled, and sent back to the United States. The rest of the captured officers and men were sent to England on the H.M. Transport Argo. All of the enlisted men arrived at Dartmoor on 26 Dec 1814, and they were released from this prison on 3 July 1815 (except for Bailey and a few other men who had died at this prison).^[26]

The seven of the eight Black men from the Lake Erie Squadron were among the last of the American POWs to return home from England after the end of the War of 1812. Many of the Black POWs refused to be released until they were guaranteed that the returning ships would dock at a northern American port. Among the Blacks there were many who were ex-slaves, born free in a northern state, or born free in another country. The fear of becoming a slave or being chained again was too much for many of the men.

Summary

It is possible that 608 men manned the ten ships of the Lake Erie Squadron during the Battle of Lake Erie on 10 September 1813. A little over 100 men were sick or were assigned to other duties during this battle. It is the author's opinion that only about sixty men (or ten percent) were African-Americans, a number that is far less than what other publications have stated.

Master Commandant Perry would not have had enough men to man all of his ships if he did not have the cooperation of the Army of the Northwest, the Army of the North, and a few state's militiamen. The pages for this article were taken from the author's book The Men of the Lake Erie Squadron 1813-1825. This book was published in 2022 by Heritage Books, Inc., Berwyn Heights, MD.

2024 General Society of the War of 1812 Board of Directors Meeting

The General Society of the War of 1812 will hold its annual Board of Directors Meeting at 10am - Noon on September 14, 2024 at the Hilton Garden Inn, Baltimore, Maryland. The meeting will be open for observation by the membership at large.

Before and After the Saturday morning meeting we are invited to participate in the Maryland Society of the War of 1812 "Defender's Day" events on a pay-as-you-go basis.

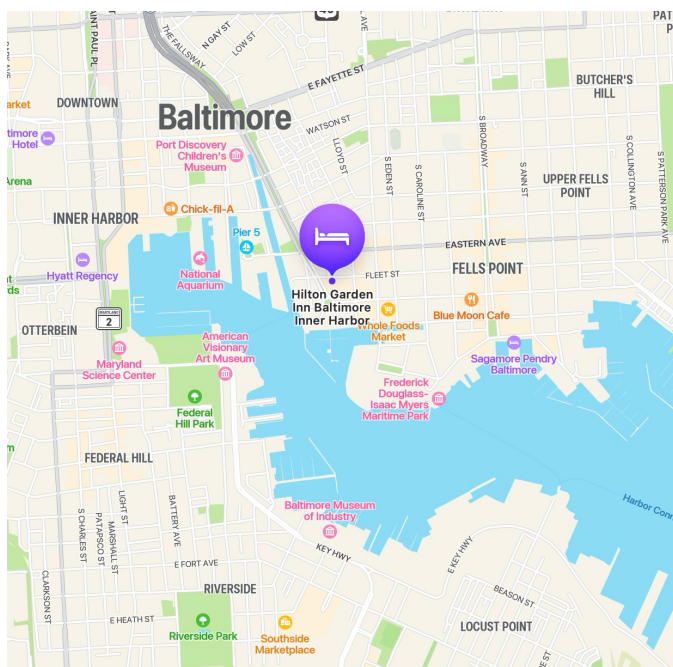

Friday evening: The Fort McHenry Defender's Day parade is scheduled for 1900 on the 13th and is approximately a 1-mile walk. If you want to participate in the parade, meet at the Fort (time to be provided) and they provide transportation to the starting point of the parade. Participants will then walk back to the Fort and pickup the cars. For the parade, please let the Maryland Society Secretary Christopher Smithson (ctsmithson@gmail.com) know several weeks prior to the event approximately if you and any guests will be participating, so they can provide transportation for that number to the Fort.

Saturday the 14th, there will be events from about 1500 to 2100 at Fort McHenry. (Folks will be responsible for their own transportation to the Fort.) Events there will likely include a private tour of the Fort, a wreath laying ceremony at the statue of George Armistead, a Flag lowering ceremony and a VIP dinner hosted by the Friends of Fort McHenry. After dinner, a military concert band usually performs and then comes fireworks. Fort McHenry has not yet released the specific Agenda, so this could change.

Cost to enter the Fort is $15 unless you have a National Park pass (and bring it with you). A pass allows entrance for you and three other guests at no charge. Some of our members will also have passes with them. Last year, the dinner, band, and fireworks were $50/person, however they are expected to be higher this year.

“Dedication of the Fort Niagara Plaque”

On Wednesday, 22 May 2024, David Morton, President of the Society of the Second War with Great Britain in the State of New York (SSWGBSNY), Robert Gang, District Deputy General Mid-Atlantic Region General Society of the War of 1812 (GSW1812), Jerome Brubaker, Assistant Director of the Old Fort Niagara Association, Inc., and two soldiers (i.e., staff members) Scott Elliott, Manager, Interpretive Programs Department, and Aidan Moroni, Military Interpreter, dedicated a plaque at the Fort Niagara Cemetery honoring the American and British soldiers who were killed or wounded during the 19 December 1813 British night assault on Fort Niagara and to those soldiers who served on the Niagara Frontier during the War of 1812.

“History of the Capture of Fort Niagara”

Fort Niagara was an important American post near the outlet of the Niagara River on Lake Ontario. During the early days of the war, it was involved in several exchanges of artillery fire against the British at Fort George on the other side of the river. On the night of 18 December, 1813, a British force consisting of the 100th Foot, the grenadier company of the 1st Battalion of the Royal Scots, and the grenadier and light companies of the 41st Foot, with some small detachments of militia and Holcroft's Company, 4th Battalion Royal Artillery crossed the Niagara River 3 miles above Fort Niagara. The force numbered 562 and was under the command of Colonel John Murray, the commanding officer of the 100th Foot. They were equipped with axes and scaling ladders and under orders to use the bayonet so as not to lose the advantage of surprise.

They captured American pickets posted in the village of Youngstown, the men having been trying to stay warm instead of keeping watch. One of the prisoners was forced to reveal the American challenge and password. The British force then advanced silently towards the fort. An advance party of some artillerymen and the grenadier company of the 100th under a lieutenant and a sergeant approached the gate, where the sergeant affected an accent from the southern American states and confused the guard long enough to gain entry. By the time the defenders became aware of the deception, it was too late to stop the British from rushing in. The American garrison was taken completely by surprise.

Resistance came mainly from two buildings, the South Redoubt and the Red Barracks, which was being used as a hospital. Some of the defenders barricaded themselves inside the South Redoubt of the fort and held off repeated attempts to break into the building. However, when they refused demands that they surrender, the British commander offered no quarter to the defenders. When the attackers forced their way into the building, the infamous order was given to "Bayonet the whole".

The British report on the engagement listed 65 Americans killed, 14 wounded prisoners and 344 other prisoners. However, Robert Lee, an American civilian who had been visiting the Fort when it was attacked, gave a sworn deposition on 18 January 1814 that the British report giving 65 Americans killed had been "issued very soon after they took possession of the fort and did not include a number that were afterwards found bayoneted in the cellars of the houses". Lee thought that "at least eighty" Americans had in fact been killed. Only six of the attackers were killed, with five wounded.

Fort Niagara remained in British possession until the end of the war and surrendered control on 22 May 1815 (references from Wikipedia).

ROTC Awards

On April 9, 2024, Past President Stuart L. Butler of the Virginia Society of the War of 1812 had the honor of awarding Cadet Daniel Weaver the General Society's ROTC Outstanding Student Award for his academic record by ranking in the top 25% of his class, his high moral character and his willingness to serve in the U.S. Army upon graduation. He is currently a sophomore attending Christopher Newport University in Newport News, Virginia.

On April 16, 2024, Past President of the Virginia Society of the War of 1812, Stuart Butler, was on hand to present three Outstanding Student Awards to three deserving ROTC cadets at University of Virginia. The awards sponsored by the General Society of the War of 1812 were awarded to those students who demonstrated outstanding academic achievement and a commitment to serve in the U.S. military armed forces. The cadets are Kyle Fetcho, Connor Pastino, and Anna Young.

QUARTERMASTER BULLETIN

Warhawks,

As you read this, I'm pleased to say that the conversion from the "classic" colors to the "updated" colors is complete. All items are now in the updated colors and all items are completely in stock.

The new Merchandise Order Form, both on the Website and included in this, and all future editions of the War Cry, has been updated. A few items of note: -There is no single line item for shipping any longer. After a review of the amount charged for shipping versus the actual cost, it was revealed that the General Society was losing money on 63.2% of all shipments. The cost of shipping has now been added to each item. That is the main, but not the only reason that some of the items have increased from previous order forms. The cost of some items has increased to us while some have decreased. US Postal rates have increased 3 times since 2022, alone. Current prices reflect those changes.

THE NEW PRICING GOES INTO EFFECT ON 7/1/2024.

You will also notice the addition of 2 new items, a low-profile hat (in 3 colors) and a new lapel pin. The low-profile, unstructured hat is lighter, and the lapel pin reflects the Star Spangled Banner Flag of 15 stars and 15 stripes. I believe the lapel pin would be a good item to give to new members, members who aid in the success of chapter or state objectives, or wear it yourself!

I'm also considering either a fleece zippered vest and/or a "Columbia type" short sleeved, lightweight fishing shirt, both embroidered with our emblem. Please drop me an email and let me know your thoughts. It's my goal to make sure that all our members have access to our insignia and the items that they want. It's my responsibility to provide both.

I appreciate the patience from our members as we moved items from one set of colors to another. Please view the new pictures of all items. As always, please feel free to contact me with questions, comments, or suggestions.

Remember the Raisin !
